

Invisible Hands: Poems

Aubade for a Seraph (or a Demon)

Wake with a dream, the dream he left you, knowledge of noetic names, he hierophant ancestral seer of the ways, of spirit song, glyph in your throat, a blackened hand, a leper's nose and murder in the strangling hours when the sky hangs low, trees bowing low, branches limbering in awe—

You can ask, then, for the angels, the thousands of birdwinged bodies without blood, to still their thrum, to bring you into a sheet behind a cloud's numb—here, there are rooms, hidden in wrinkles, in simple folds here, the slippery skins will never stop begging for more than is here, the cold doesn't slip in to the uncovered air just between your shoulderblades, or the anxious curve of your hip, where his hand warred once broad, familiar, palmed, but now somewhere else, faceless in time—

And even the shadows here have tongues, waiting to lick the length of you, the creases of your ears, the lattice of the corners of your eyes—afraid to close but too afraid to look to one place— it was a hand there around your throat— and it is a long time before sunrise.
